AFTER THE STORM

#41

"See Naples and die," they used to say, but as the people of the city crawled out of the cellars of their bomb-pitted homes into the bright autumn sunshine to welcome the liberating Allied troops, there was little to be seen of the beauty that inspired the proverb. Only the occasional crack of a sniper's rifle and the answering rattle of a machine gun broke the unnatural silence of this city of a million inhabitants.

Not a tram moved, not a bus. The high vaulted railroad station was a mass of twisted metal. The only sound of traffic came from mechanized units moving into the city. A few street cleaners in their long robes were starting to clear away debris and to remove the bodies of their townspeople who had fought the Germans in the streets or had fallen dead from starvation.

The guant and disheveled populace scrambled over the piles of rubble, in their outstretched hands jugs and bottles.

"Water", they cried, and "Bread".

Seven weeks before, the Germans had destroyed all but a few small reservoirs and demolished the aqueducts. Those that had escaped were so inadequate that the people were reduced to dipping up cups of water from the sewers, and even this supply was almost exhausted. The retreating Nazi had taken every loaf of bread - had even fired into bread lines and grabbed the scanty stocks. There was no gas, no electricity, no telephone service, no drugs and medicines for the hospitals and doctors trying to care for the sick and wounded. The Germans had removed every piece of railroad equipment which had escaped Allied bombs; they had driven away in every thing left on wheels, even the electric tram-buses.

The liberating armies set to work to bring the city back to life.

Don't like this for Europe: Town Board has turned down projects on devastation & Relief, & UNRRA is still too vague to write about. And Italians are still busy.
